The Heart of Our Work

What do you hope our clients feel when they interact with CCVLP?

I hope they feel like they've landed in a safe space. I hope they feel like they are listened to, empathized with, and never judged.

-Mia, Co-Executive Director: Community Engagement

What makes this work feel urgent or necessary right now?

The impacts of immigration changes on domestic violence and sexual assault survivors have increased safety risks immensely. Navigating the criminal and civil legal world can put many survivors at risk of deportation or losing financial stability, and it also prevents people who are unsafe from reporting to law enforcement.

-Blair, Survivor Support Senior Paralegal

Meet the Movement

In this issue of the Justice Journal, we want to give a huge shout out to attorney volunteer extraordinaire: Strider Kachelein, Associate Attorney at Brown & Winters. Strider holds multiple Housing Justice Project advice clinics with us per month, he helps at our offsite legal clinics, he shows up to our fun events (important to point out that he was a member of the winning team from our Quiz for a Cause trivia event-no biggie), and, he's as nice as can be. Everyone would greatly benefit from a Strider in their life! Thank you for all that you do. The CCVLP appreciates you greatly!

Here's what Strider had to say:

How long have you been practicing? How did you come into doing landlord/tenant work for CCVLP?

I've been practicing law for almost 5 years. Having established my primary practice in longtail environmental cleanup and historical insurance matters, I have always been drawn to how I could use my law degree to directly help people in immediate need. We have all been tenants before, and until our current housing system dramatically changes, it is an honor to assist CCVLP with helping the Clark County community advocate for tenant rights.

Why do you volunteer with the CCVLP?

I find great value in volunteering with CCVLP because of their incredibly hardworking team and mission to serve Clark County's low-income and marginalized communities. They make the process very easy to onboard and provide all types of support to ensure you can advocate to the best of your abilities.
